SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 1860. COMMEMORATION OF IRVING. The discourse on the Life and Genius of Washington Irving, delivered by Wm. Cullen

Bryant, before the New York Historical So- were the delight of our fathers, and are ciety on Tuesday evening, was a masterly delineation of the personal traits and literary career of the illustrious American author. With a generous appreciation of Irving's position in literature, and a cordial sympathy with the virtues that rendered him the object of such affectionate homage from his countrymen, the tribute of Mr. Bryant combined an exquisite beauty of expression, and a wealth of poetic illustration, which gives it a prominent place among the most admirable specimens of eloquent and just eulogiums.

We publish the concluding portion of the Although Irving had reached an age beyond which life is rarely prolonged, the news of his death was everywhere received with profound sorrow. The whole country mourned, but the grief was most deeply felt in his immediate neighborhood; the little children wept for the loss of their good friend .-When the day of his funeral arrived, the people gathered from far and near to attend it; this capital poured forth its citizens; the and strife never enter, and where the hartrains on the railway were crowded, and a multitude, like a mass meeting, but reverently silent, moved through the streets of the pure than that of love." neighboring village, which had been dressed in the emblems of mourning, and clustered about the tered about the church and the burial- munity a Stimulant, Pure, Healthful and invigoground. He was ever that it is entirely free from poisonous or deleteriready to do kind offices, tender of the feelings of others, carefully just, but ever leaning to the merciful side of justice, averse from
